Journalism is a gritty profession where enormous learning comes on the job, far more than it does from studying abstract principles in textbooks or how-to manuals. It is a profession that can sometimes hinge on the last-minute decision of an astute editor, enabling a journalist in the field to deliver a poignant story that stands apart from reams of mundane, factual reportage.

Thus it was for me on one wintry morning in January 2013, when I travelled from Washington DC to Chicago to bear witness to an event that mattered to most, if not every Indian citizen: the sentencing of David Headley for his role in the 2008 Mumbai terror attacks.

When I stepped out of the frosty Chicago air and into the District Court premises, there was already a throng of journalists clamouring to get into position for the best possible coverage of the proceedings.
