TIAS students interact and discuss about women's health

The debate aimed to engage participants in the current environment of women's healthcare, including the problems they face and tactics for lobbying for increased access and comprehensive treatment. Students were given the chance to apply their talents in leadership, management, and strategic thinking to effect good change in this region. Participants emphasized the relevance of women's health concerns and advocated for policy measures to reduce inequities.

They suggested that forming alliances with healthcare providers, advocacy organizations, and other stakeholders can bolster advocacy efforts and increase the effectiveness of programs. They also discussed about the challenges faced by women in maintaining their health such as high healthcare costs, lack of insurance coverage, and limited access to affordable healthcare facilities can deter women from seeking necessary medical care. However, they may encounter challenges in accessing timely diagnosis, treatment, and ongoing management of these conditions.
