Why is finding talent so hard?

Purvi Sheth

Remember attending my first ever client briefing as a young trainee. The client had several roles he needed talent for. "I want impeccable profiles: best of qualifications and credentials; should have the ideal managerial personality and must fit our culture". He then proceeded to elucidate a 40-point list of requirements for candidates! "I will make no compromises," he declared.

One of the biggest follies in talent acquisition is expectation! This is true for companies and candidates alike - both want the "perfect fit". Such expectations are a set-up for disappointment. Companies want incumbents to be able to hit the ground running, fit the organization structure and ethos seamlessly, show leadership and long term potential as well as be motivated to perform immediately. On the other hand, candidates require companies to have stimulating roles, growth and development opportunities, high salaries, great teams and of course the perfect work-life balance. Expectations at both ends are diverse and this
